Christmas In The Air

Marie Irish

Once upon a time, in a city of dazzling lights and towering buildings, there was a magical streetcar. It wasn't magical because it could fly or talk. No, it was magical because it always traveled on a special day - Christmas Eve. Every year, it brought people from all corners of the city together, spreading the holiday spirit with each stop it made.

One frosty Christmas Eve, the streetcar was busier than ever. On board were some colorful characters - Dan, a brave boy who walked with the aid of a crutch; Mrs. Newton, a loving mother with her small baby; Mr. Genial, a jolly man laden with lots of bundles; Susie Olson, a cheerful housemaid; James Denton, a kind young man; Mrs. Tiredly, a hardworking woman; Grandma Bascom, who was traveling alone; Miss Moneybags, a wealthy young lady; Mr. Grumpy, a grumpy man indeed; and Mr. Goodwill, a man who always looked on the bright side.

The journey began with the conductor's hearty call, "All aboard!" Grandma Bascom, in her fluster to get aboard, dropped her satchel, but James Denton, always eager to help, came to her aid. Amid the rattling of the streetcar and chatter of the passengers, Grandma shared her plans for Christmas at her son's house, eliciting smiles from all around.

In the corner, Mr. Grumpy voiced his distaste for Christmas, calling it a "ridiculous custom." But his words didn't dampen the others' spirits. They shared their own love for Christmas - the joy of giving and receiving presents, the excitement of hanging stockings, and the happiness of being with loved ones. Even Mrs. Tiredly, weary from her long workdays, found comfort and joy in the holiday season.

As the streetcar rattled on, picking up more passengers along the way, it became a space filled with laughter, shared stories, and even a crying baby that James managed to soothe. When Dan came aboard, limping with his crutch, he shared his story of leaving the hospital and worrying about not having Christmas gifts for his family. But, in the spirit of Christmas, Grandma Bascom gave Dan a handkerchief intended for her daughter-in-law, and Mr. Goodwill gave him a dollar to buy presents.

Miss Moneybags, a kindly lady in fine clothes, promised to speak with Dan's doctor about reducing his hospital bill. This unexpected kindness made Dan's eyes glisten with gratitude. Mr. Grumpy, however, had no patience for the merry atmosphere and gruffly exited the streetcar, leaving a trail of laughter behind.

Susie Olson and Mr. Genial joined the ride next, bringing with them even more Christmas cheer. They shared their own plans for the holiday, painting a picture of lively family gatherings and heartwarming acts of kindness. Mr. Genial's voice echoed through the streetcar, saying, "I always feel like saying 'God bless everybody' at Christmas-time," to which Miss Moneybags agreed and added, "He blesses us when we help make Christmas a happy day."

Finally, the streetcar reached Sixty-first street, the last stop and Grandma Bascom's destination. As she and the other passengers disembarked, they wished each other a Merry Christmas. They left the streetcar behind, their hearts filled with warmth, their spirits lifted, and their belief in the magic of Christmas reinforced.

And so it was, every Christmas Eve, the magical streetcar traveled through the city, spreading joy and cheer, helping everyone remember the true spirit of Christmas - kindness, compassion, and love for one another.
