Halloween Greetings

Lenore K. Dolan

Once upon a chilly Halloween night, in a cozy little town not far from the woods, five young friends gathered for an exciting adventure. They were known for their Halloween tradition. Every year, they would dress as different Halloween cards and journey through the town, sharing spooky tales and Halloween cheer.

"Ready for our Halloween adventure?" The first child asked, her eyes glimmering with excitement.

They all nodded eagerly and, together, they began their Halloween chant:

"We're the lively Halloween cards, bringing thrills and chills this night, we'll share with you our spooky tales, that'll give you quite a fright!"

The first child, dressed as a haunted house card, stepped forward and began her story:

"There are eerie ghosts and goblins, that in shadows dwell. Even when you cannot see, they weave their wicked spell!" She waved her card to make it appear as if the ghosts and goblins were coming to life.

The second child, with a card showing impish creatures hiding in pumpkin patches, chimed in: "Merry imps of Halloween, dart in the darkness bright. Watch your step, or you might trip, when they're out of sight!" The group giggled as they imagined stumbling over invisible imps.

Next, the third child held her card high, showing a sky filled with witches on broomsticks and prowling black cats. "Witches sweep across the sky, black cats screech and stare, Ghosts and goblins join the fun, so walk this night with care!" She warned, making spooky noises to imitate the witches and cats.

The fourth child held up her eerie card and began, "When doors creak and windows moan, and shadows seem to lean, be careful with your every move, for then, it's Halloween." She moved her card in a way that made the eerie forms dance under the moonlight.

The fifth and final child presented her card, decorated with friendly goblins holding four-leaf clovers, and shared her tale: "May the goblins visiting you, on this Halloween so keen, bring you all the best of luck, like never before seen!"

After sharing their stories and creating an atmosphere filled with delightful shivers and anticipation, they all chimed in together: "Now we, the Halloween cards, bid our friends adieu, But worry not, for we promise this, next year, we'll be back anew!"

With laughter and warm smiles, they ventured off into the night, their Halloween cards held high. As they disappeared, the echoes of their laughter and stories lingered, wrapping the town in the enchanting spirit of Halloween.
